What I am looking for is something similar to the Time delay graph in the following image: The idea is to draw time on a map like a traffic or connection graph. I have successfully drawn a directed graph with links on a map, but I cannot get the time delay. The closest I have come so far is using a custom tick with a modified Google Maps API V3. Here is what I have so far: I am wondering if there is an easier way to do this. A: Although I have not tested it, this should give you a start: By adding a marker and event listeners to the markers you can easily show when a request was made and you can then count the delays in order to show the time as you show in the image. You'll have to do some more tweaking

The chemical pathways for D-alanine and L-alanine biosynthesis in Enterococcus faecalis were investigated by synthesis of ^{13}C -labelled (U- ^{13}C) alanine. Cells grown on L-[U- ^{13}C]alanine had a substantial excess of labelled D-alanine, suggesting that D-alanine is the direct precursor of L-alanine in this bacterium. There was no significant difference between the rate of ^{13}C -enrichment of D-alanine derived from L-[U- ^{13}C]alanine and the rate of formation of L-alanine from D-alanine. Thus, the alanine racemase in E. faecalis is active towards both D- and L-alanine and there is no significant direct phosphorylation of alanine to D-alanine. The results also demonstrated that the racemase is not activated by L-alanine, and the mechanism for this is not known. The role of glycine in L-alanine biosynthesis was investigated by (U-13C) glycine incorporation. Glycine is incorporated into L-alanine with essentially the same efficiency as into L-glutamate (from L-glutamine) in these studies, suggesting that glycine is not an important precursor of L-alanine in E. faecalis.
